Death of Dom Pedro.

The eventful career of Dom Pedro, ex-Emperor of Brazil, is closed at last with his death. That he passionately loved his country there is no doubt. His dying words expressed his strong affection, and his parting regret was that he could not go back to Brazil to die. Taken all in all he was an excellent and enlightened ruler. His reign, lasting forty years, was an unusually long one, and during that time he had secured himself in the affections of his people that it is doubtful whether they would so soon have deposed him had it not been for the undue influence which the Count d'Eu and his wife, the Princess Isabella, exercised over him, and his increasing age and infirmities, which made him specially susceptible to it and induced the fear that their cabals might end in fastening royalty upon the people after his death in spite of their rapidly increasing republican tendencies. Though he lost his throne and died far away from home it will always be remembered that he was an exemplary sovereign. The great work of emancipating the slaves belongs to his fame. He threw open the River Amazon and its tributaries to the world's commerce. He developed the arts and sciences in Brazil and proved himself to be a progressive, patriotic, and public-spirited ruler. History will give him an honorable place in its pages as a wise, mild, and generous sovereign.

It is as yet an open question whether his administration of the monarchy was not preferable to the existing administration of the republic on the lines of personal ambition and apparent personal incapacity. Dom Pedro was succeeded by Gen. da Fonseca, a soldier by birth and training, unacquainted with public business, and particularly with public finances. Almost his first act was to swamp the country with irredeemable paper currency, and when the fictitious boom showed signs of bursting he added to his folly by demanding of congress that it should still further swell the volume of this worthless currency. When congress resisted his proposition he took the fatal step of dissolving it and making himself dictator. He usurped all the principles of constitutional government with the expectation that the army and a majority of the people would stand behind him. In this he was mistaken. A bloodless revolution followed, but its purport was so manifest that his power at once crumbled away, and he was compelled to abdicate in favor of Gen. Floriano Peixoto, the vice-president, himself a soldier who had been active in deposing Dom Pedro. The latter is to be credited with seeking to undo the results of his predecessor's usurpation of office, but the task before him is one of a difficult and complicated character. The revolutions in Rio Grande de Sul and other provinces which followed the dictatorship of Da Fonseca are still menacing, and the people in those provinces have not yet acceded to the demands of his successor, though he is apparently doing everything in his power to undo the mischief caused by the Dictator. The financial troubles still remain, and it is in the face of such discouragements as these that he must order a presidential election under the terms of the constitution. While the death of Dom Pedro probably will end any further monarchical intrigue, there may be yet serious trouble in store for Brazil before it settles down as a strong and stable republic and enjoys the large measure of prosperity which Dom Pedro gave it in his palmy days.

Prohibition for South Carolina.

The house of representatives today passed, by a vote of 40 to 34, a prohibition bill. The bill absolutely prohibits the sale of beer, liquors, wines, etc., in any portion of the state or the transportation of either by railroads, express companies, etc., under penalties. It was passed after a bitter fight lasting two days. The law is said to be framed on that now in force in Iowa. It is generally believed that if this bill becomes a law it will divide the democratic party in the state and result in the complete enfranchisement of the negro voters, who will be called in to take part in the state and national campaigns of next year.

The American mine contractors are making good progress with both shaft and drift. They are already working in ore in the north drift and it is probable that the American will within a few weeks enter the list of the producing and paying mines.
